The result is generally this: the young trees for a time grow, but in two or three years they begin to look sickly, and die off. On examining the roots, they are found to be destroyed by a fungus, which has done nature's work in assisting the decomposition of the dead roots, and, for want of a further suply of food, attacks the living ones, which, in turn, succumb to its encroachments."

Who knows the value of a garden of flowers? Like music, they possess magic by beauty and fragrance: the other by melody and harmony, by which the sentiments are refined, and the virtues of the heart strengthened. All surronning objects exert an influence upon the mind, and a correspondence always exists between outward objects.

Who knows they are found to be made, and this new institution will do something toward supplying the want.
